

ABSTRACT

A signal can be analysed to determine statistical characteristics indicative of, for example, the predictability or time reversibility of the signal. The signal is examined to locate events corresponding to the crossing of predetermined levels with predetermined slopes. Multiple versions of the signal are combined, the versions being shifted with respect to each other by amounts corresponding to the spacings of the detected events. The shape of the resulting representation provides statistical information regarding the signal.